About the Faculty

Humanities

This is an excellent opportunity to join a well-established and successful faculty which values the contributions of each member of the team. The Humanities team works within a professional, enthusiastic, supportive and collegiate framework based on the school's CORE values. It is made up of eight discrete subjects with geography, history, ethics and philosophy taught to 11 – 18 and politics, sociology and psychology taught in Post-16.

The Humanities Faculty is situated in a suite of rooms in close proximity to one another. We have an ethos of 'all-ability' teaching which aims to get the very best out students and therefore there is no setting of classes. Curriculum development and sharing of good practice is an integral part of our approach to developing teaching and learning. Colleagues are encouraged to lead the development of teaching and learning approaches both within the faculty and across the school.

Sociology and Psychology are very popular and successful A level courses that have established themselves as integral elements of the Sixth Form provision. Both follow the AQA A level specifications which we have found are most suitable and challenging for our intake. Many students choose either of these subjects to be their major A level subject, with many combining both Sociology and Psychology. As a result, year on year, considerable numbers of our students pursue social sciences courses in higher education establishments.

The foundation stones for learning for both Psychology and Sociology are laid by the faculty in Key Stage 3 with Geography and History being taught for 2 hours per week each whilst Ethics and Philosophy is taught for 1 hour per week. At GCSE all Key Stage 4 subjects have 5 hours per fortnight and Post-16 subjects have 10 hours per fortnight.

We have a proven and lengthy record of success and for positive student achievement. We believe our success is due our fantastic students, a very hardworking team and the excellent relationships we build with pupils, based on the school's CORE values.
